Public transport driver Jerryyme Corre suffered shocking torture at the hands of police in the Philippines, after they accused him of killing a police officer.

He told Amnesty that, after his arrest, the officers “kicked and punched me on the sides, neck, stomach and knees”. Then they blindfolded him, handcuffed his ankles, and beat him throughout the night, hitting the soles of his feet with a wooden baton.

If Jerryyme couldn't answer their questions, they punched him. They put a cloth over his mouth and poured water down his throat “until I felt like I was drowning”. Later, when he still refused to confess, they took exposed electric wires and electrocuted him on his back, side and thighs. Then they threatened to kill him.

As they tried to force a confession, the officers repeatedly called him ‘Boyet’. He told them this wasn't his name, and a local village official also told them they had the wrong man. They refused to listen, and eventually charged Jerryyme with possessing drugs. He's still in jail more than two years on.

Together, we can get justice for Jerryyme. Please write to the authorities in the Philippines, calling for a full investigation into these torture allegations, and to bring those responsible to justice.
